Republika Srpska is preparing for the coming parliamentary elections. The Chief of OSCE Mission in Bosnia, Robert Frowick, visited Banja Luka today.

"Generally, preparations for the parliamentary elections are going ahead as planned. There are ten days until the elections, and OSCE will be working on the technical issues and procedure matters", said Frowick to journalists in Banja Luka. Representatives of OSCE will make it possible for everyone who is entitled to vote to do so, to exercise their right in the parliamentary elections. He stated that the important phase of the electoral process is under way; therefore, frequent meetings with representatives of the political parties are required. The leaders of the political parties in Banja Luka have suggested shortening the period of pre-election silence, which has lasted for 48h so far. A definite decision about that was not made today.

OSCE would pay much attention to the media, because they are trying to ensure that all political factions have equal access to the media. As to why some areas in the eastern part of RS do not have the SRT signal, he answered that they are not able to follow everything regarding the media, and according to their information there are many small independent televisions installed.
